Have you seen the picture of a dog on music records with HMV written on it? The dog is listening to the music of the record coming out of the loudspeaker. HMV stands for 'His Master's Voice'. How did a gramophone company get this picture? There is story behind this picture.

Once there lived two orphans. They were Tom and John. They were very poor and had to work hard for their living. The elder brother Tom was a very good singer. The younger brother John was a painter. The elder brother Tom used to sing songs and John used to draw wonderful pictures and sell them. In this way they earned some money.

Tom had a pet dog. The dog went with him wherever he went Tom loved him too.

One day Tom met with an accident. He was rushed to the hospital. The dog, too, went to hospital and sat behind his master's bed. John tried to bring the dog home. The dog would not leave his master at any cost. He refused to eat anything and became weak.

One day John was playing the record of Tom's song on the gramophone. The dog recognized his master's voice. He came near the machine. He waited for his master to come out of the machine. He thought that his master was singing a song from inside the machine. John let the record play on. He went in and came back with a dish of food. He placed the dish before the dog and, to his surprise; the dog licked the plate clean.

John sat down to draw the picture of a dog sitting beside a gramophone, listening to his master's voice. That is the picture of His Master's Voice, HMV.
