An Orphanage of Elephants

In the dry season, elephants sometimes leave the jungle to look for food. They often find food in the farmers' fields. When the farmers scare the elephants away, the young elephants sometimes panic and fall into mud holes or wells. By the time they are taken out, their parents are gone. Other baby elephants are orphaned when their parents die.

In Sri Lanka, an Asian country, baby elephants that have lost their parents are sent to a place called Pinnewala. It is an elephant orphanage that was opened in 1975.

The babies at the orphanage are fed milk in bottles. Leaves are also given to them. When a gong sounds in the morning the elephants know it is time to go to the river and start walking down the path. Children from the village join them in a kind of parade. At the river, the elephants drink, play and bathe.

When the elephants are big enough, some of them are sold to zoos. One elephant, named 'Ganesha', was recently chosen to go to the National Zoo in Washington, D.C.
